

Karl Marx's Theory of Socialism

Karl Marx, a German economist and philosopher, introduced the theory of Socialism as a reaction against Capitalism. He believed that capitalism creates inequality between the rich and the poor.

Marx divided society into two classes:

- Bourgeoisie (Capitalists): who own the means of production.
- Proletariat (Workers): who sell their labor for wages.

According to Marx, capitalists exploit workers by taking most of the profit (called surplus value) from their labor. This causes class conflict and economic inequality.

Marx believed that one day, workers would unite and revolt against the capitalists. After the revolution, all means of production—factories, land, and resources—would be owned collectively by society.

The aim of socialism is to create a classless and equal society, where everyone works for the common good and wealth is shared fairly.

In short: Karl Marx's socialism seeks to end exploitation, promote equality, and ensure social welfare by replacing private ownership with collective ownership.
